1. The first step in the process of disaggregating interpersonal violence is to identify the different forms of violence that are being experienced. This can be done by looking at the different types of violence that are being reported, such as physical violence, sexual violence, and psychological violence. Once the different forms of violence have been identified, the next step is to look at the different causes of the violence. This can be done by looking at the different risk factors that are associated with each type of violence. Finally, the third step is to develop interventions that are targeted at the different causes of the violence. This can be done by developing programs that are designed to address the different risk factors that are associated with each type of violence.
